Environmental truth teller. Sustainable living advocate. Defender of the wild. Friend of local farmers. Alison Morrow began her journalism career as a producer at FOX News Channel in New York City. She left news to complete a Master of Divinity degree at Boston University, specializing in Psychology & Counseling. Her return to news as a reporter took her to newsrooms in Georgia, Tennessee, Florida and Washington state. Alison most recently served as Environmental Reporter for KING TV, the NBC affiliate in Seattle. She is the recipient of two Emmy Awards, an Associated Press Award and the prestigious Sigma Delta Chi Award for Excellence in Journalism from the Society of Professional Journalists. She has worked with a wide range of clients from research biologists to non-profits to farmers and has conducted multiple media training workshops, both locally and internationally. Alison hosts a popular podcast detailing the plight of the endangered Southern Resident killer whales as well as a YouTube channel focused on media analysis and free speech issues. She is the wife of a USMC veteran, and the mom of a rescue pit bull and two horses.
