

Marisol Morales enjoys creating digital media content, experimenting with emerging technology, and developing social media marketing campaigns for nonprofits and foundations. As the Digital Communications Manager at EarthCorps, Marisol loves making beautiful digital graphics, engaging with the community on social media, connecting people with opportunities, and developing creative content for EarthCorps newsletters.

Before joining EarthCorps, Marisol worked as a Communications and Development Coordinator at Latino Community Fund and Washington Nonprofits. She is excited to apply her ten years of experience in the nonprofit sector and new skills learned in the Digital Technology and Cultures Degree program at Seattle University, connecting families and professionals through digital media tools that are interactive, accessible, and user-friendly. She is currently a part-time graduate student pursuing a Master of Communication in Digital Media degree at the University of Washington. In her spare time, she serves as a board member for echoX, a cross-community and cross-generational initiative that leverages the power and ubiquity of the internet and social media to amplify our region's ethnic communities' voices. She continues to pursue her interests and passions in art, technology, and digital communications in hopes of having a lasting positive impact on her community and the environment.

Connect with Marisol on LinkedIn